

Pupils meet music business stars

Talented young rock musicians at London Rock Academy, a Saturday school for 10 to 18-year-olds, were delighted to meet Chris Cowey, executive producer of Top of the Pops and The Brit Awards on Saturday.

He came to advise these budding young rock musicians on how to reach the top.

Virginia Miralles, principal of London Rock Academy, said: "Our young students were very excited about meeting Chris Cowey.

"This is just one example of the strong links we are developing between education and the music industry which we hope will have a positive effect on the development and promotion of our new up-and-coming bands today."

Pictured left: producer Chris Cowey with young musicians

London Rock Academy is a completely new music education initiative which provides really exciting opportunities for young aspiring rock musicians.

Visiting tutors range from members of Faithless to Black Sabbath.

Chris Cowey said: "I wish there had been sessions like this when I was a young wannabe.

"What a great opportunity for our young rock musicians."

Students from various London boroughs take regular classes each Saturday with experienced rock musicians and teachers at Imperial College, South Kensington.

At the end of each term, they play in a public concert, as well as taking part in a summer term Battle of the Bands attended by renowned members of the music industry.

Also on offer are additional gigs, competitions and recording opportunities – a really great opportunity for our young rock musicians.

For further information regarding classes at London Rock Academy please visit londonrock.org.uk; enquiries: info@londonrock.org.uk or phone 020 8241 0933.

